

not Man's corrupt nature, but certain corrupt men, were to blame for individual and corporate inadequacy.

The hate Hitler generated formed a magnetic field, which reached far, particles of hatred stirred, like iron filings by a magnet, to fall into its pattern. Even as far as England the field reached, though here, distant from the centre, the force was only faintly felt, the pattern only faintly traced. Sir John Simon found it necessary to issue a statement that, despite a biblical name, he was of Welsh extraction; Lord Camrose, proprietor of the Daily Telegraph, brought a successful libel action against an organ of the British Union of Fascists for having falsely implied that he was a Jew; in one of his articles, Dean Inge suggested that Jews were using 'their not inconsiderable influence in the Press and in Parliament to embroil us with Germany/

This suggestion was indignantly challenged by, among others, Sir William Crawford, President of the Institute of Incorporated Practitioners in Advertising, who wrote that, though he had acted for a number of Jewish firms, never had he received from them 'any suggestion or instruction that advertising policy-should in any way be influenced by, or attempt to influence, the editorial policy of the papers selected to carry the advertising campaign'; and when Dean Inge was asked to substantiate the charge he had made, he admitted that it had no other foundation than information given him by a journalist to the effect that when his newspaper adopted a policy sympathetic to Germany, Jewish business firms which advertised in the paper, stated that, unless the policy was dropped, they would cancel their advertising contracts.

Anti-semitic slogans were chalked on walls and in the roadway, coldly or indifferently eyed by most passers-by, but remaining, until rain washed them away; windows of shops belonging to Jews were broken, and in the darkness offensive epithet shouted. In less unedifying forms, the same tendency wa apparent; Mr. Douglas Reed in Insanity Fair denounced th
 Nazi regime to the satisfaction of its most determined adversaria but in Disgrace Abounding, handled Jews unkindly.
